happen, and any daughter watching learns that admiring a man is something to be embarrassed about. Marriage is catechesis, whether or not you mean to teach a class. I am raising four future husbands, and I will not teach them that the man of the house is a punchline. I will teach them that he is someone to be honored and adored.

And before the criticism floods in, this isn't tradwife cosplay. I work. I write. I also think being a wife and mother is my central vocation, and I don't see any tensions between these roles.

So here's the assignment, and it's a simple one: Say the uncool sentence out loud. Brag about your husband at the dinner table, point at the ring, tell him you're proud of him. Because our children are listening. They are learning from us what marriage is supposed to look like, and they need to know that marriage is not a decades-long competition over who is smarter, more competent, or less annoying. It is two people who chose each other, who chose to honor, protect, forgive, and delight in one another.

That's what made the Taylor Swift clip so striking. For a few seconds, there was no ironic detachment. There wasn't an eye roll or a joke at her husband's expense. Instead it was a woman, in front of a stadium and a national audience, absolutely delighted to say that's my husband.

We could use a lot more of that.
